know when and where to tell the truth There is nothing that can make more trouble for a person than warbling the truth about matters and things when it cannot be backed up with evidence. "The greater the truth the greater the libel" libel" is a legal maxim; and those who have been careless in the telling of it have found to their sorrow that this is so. Truth can easily be taken for the image of stander, and men have won repute as slanderers who have unwisely used it. In neighborhood and social affairs the truth is best forgotten. It doesn't do to parade it, for it is like a two-edged sword and likely cut on both edges. There has to be much art in making excuses; and however well it may be done the excuse habit is always a bad habit, in the workshop of elsewhere. It has been said that "he is a poor mechanic who can't make an excuse," but he is a poorer one who makes too many. The fact is the making of excuses is so closely related to inefficiently to the habit in bad odor with the bosses. Where there is cause for an excuse something has gone wrong, and applying the reasons for it are selden accepted as satisfactory.
